Course Description:

The institutional setting that defines the rules of the political game in Israel is complicated, mostly unstructured, based on many veto players and agenda setters showing a constant conflict between the dynamics of change and stagnation. The players in this setting (individuals and organizations alike) maneuver within political, social and economic crises, while trying to mitigate the tensions within a society characterized with overlapping and cross-cutting cleavages. This complexity and plethora of social conflicts have led scholars to propose two claims which are salient in the Israel studies literature. The first is that Israel is sui-generis. Hence, it should be studied as a unique case that cannot be compared to other cases. The second is that Israel is not a democracy. Rather, it is at best an ethnic democracy or even an ethnocracy. While presenting both these claims and their logic, this course takes a different perspective.

Using the conceptual toolbox brought forth by rational-choice institutionalism, this course shows that the different components of the Israeli political system can (and should) be compared to other democratic settings. That is, we use the main components of the Austen-Smith and Banks Legislative Game and others developed in its light. This game was designed for the study of multiparty competitive political settings. It assumes that politics is a strategic interaction played by resources-seeking individuals and organizations. Thus, politics should be studied on the basis of the analysis of players' preferences and the specific institutional rules in that setting (i.e. the electoral method, the decision making mechanism in parliament and the way coalitions are sustained). Understanding these features of the political interaction allows us to comprehend the strategic choices participants in this interaction make in the pre-electoral phase, the Election Day, the coalitional process and the actual legislation.

For the Israeli case, each player type (voters, activists, party elites, parties, members of Knesset and their factions, government ministers, premiers and judges) will be analyzed theoretically using rational-choice institutionalism concepts, comparative data and in-depth empirical study (qualitative and quantitative) of the Israeli case. That analysis will show that although Israel has more to achieve in terms of liberal democracy, it is not a polity which does not belong to the family of democratic nations. Moreover, it shows that the Israeli case should be included in the comparative analysis of polities as whole and democratic polities in particular. That said, the social problems, lack of solidarity and inequality between Jews and Arabs as well as within the Jewish population will be presented and discussed. Specifically, we will study:

- The historical and sociological sources of Israel's polity.
- Discussion of the controversy regarding Israel's democratic nature.
- Israeli society's political preferences: overlapping and crosscutting social cleavages, social solidarity, and implications on politics.
- Israel's parties: players, policy positions and intraparty power relations.
- The (non) constitutional arrangements which define the Israeli political institutional setting.
- Judicial institutions in Israel and their struggle for power in the political process.
- The electoral method and its strategic implications for voters and parties.
- Israel's Parliament (Knesset): agenda setting, fragmentation and cohesiveness.

- Israel's government coalitions: (in)decisiveness, (i)resoluteness and (in)stability.
- The policy process in Israel: politicians, bureaucrats and interest groups.
- If time is left: discussion of the coalition politics accompanying the conflict resolution process between Jews and Arabs.

Readings

These books are the basic texts we use in this course and they are available at the University Book Store:

Arian, A. (2005). Politics in Israel: The Second Republic. Washington DC: CQ Press. Shepse, K.A. (2010). Analyzing Politics. New York: WW Norton & Co. 2nd ed.

Also, we will use the following book:

Bard, M. G. and D. Nachmias (Eds.) (2009). Israel Studies: An Anthology. DC: Jewish Virtual Library, 2009.

It is accessible online at:

http://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/isdf/text/anthologytoc.html?352,279

I will use quite a lot of research and review papers. Most of these papers are available through JSTOR. Others which are conference papers and working papers will be uploaded to the BlackBoard. One more note- in some of these papers there are formal models that include (daunting) mathematical equations and (fearsome) statistical analyses. I know that most of you are not trained in this math or stats but the papers include verbal presentations of most claims and findings so you can stick to those while reading, writing the critical reading assignments, preparing to the test etc. Those who are thinking of pursuing graduate level training in Political Science (or nowadays almost any other social sciences advanced training) this might be a good option for you to see if this direction works for you.

This is the reading list according to the order of meetings we will have. The complete bibliography appears after the table:

Student Responsibilities

The final grade will be divided as follows:

15% Participation

20% Critical Reading 1

20% Critical Reading 2

20% Group Project

25% Final Exam

These are the dates of the assignments' submission:

September 30th Critical Reading Assignment No. 1

November 11th Critical Reading Assignment No. 2

December 2nd Group Project

Dates of submission are final and any delay in submission not prearranged with me will yield a zero grade for the assignment.

Critical readings:

- 1. Choose one of the research papers (NOT BOOK CHAPTERS) studied by that point of the course in which submission is due.
- 2. Present its main research problem and the way it studies that problem. If it is a quantitative empirical paper, present its research question, concepts, measurement, hypotheses and findings. If it is a qualitative paper present its main themes, narrative, method of analysis and insights. If it is a theoretical deductive paper present its main concepts, axioms and hypotheses.
- 3. Propose a critique of that paper with respect to one of the following:
- a. Its theoretical assumptions to the problem and question.
- b. The concepts it uses.
- c. The way it measures/interprets/analyzes these concepts.
- d. The way the results of analysis are interpreted.

Group Project:

By October 15th five groups will submit a list of names of group members. Make sure you belong to one of the groups beforehand, or else people will be randomly assigned. Each group will simulate the strategic setting of a party leadership with accordance to the following division:

Group A- a Center party

Group B- A Center-Right party

Group C- A Center-Left party

Group D- An Extreme-Right party

Group E- An Extreme-Left party

By December 2nd each group will submit a strategic report, based on the readings and lectures, for 'its' party stating:

- 1. The potential voters' social composition and economic status.
- 2. The potential voters' policy positions on all relevant policy dimensions.
- 3. The policy that should be declared by the party in its pre-electoral platform.
- 4. The way its potential voters should be mobilized on Election Day.
- 5. The implications this strategy will have on the coalitions the party can join to.

Final Exam

The final exam will be based on two essay questions. Questions would be based on the following form:

- 1. Some claim that electoral rules affect the level of representation in political institutions and the way they function.
- a. Present and explain three characteristics of electoral systems that affect the level of representation in parliament. Illustrate the characteristics' affect on representation using the Israeli case.
- b. Present and explain two characteristics of electoral systems that affect the way coalitions function in multiparty parliaments. Illustrate the characteristics' affect on coalitions using the Israeli case.

Active Participation

Active participation should be based on contribution to class discussion on the basis of reading the relevant reading items, and other related scholarly work you are familiar with. In order to receive participation credit for a meeting at the end of each lesson you should be able to present at least one discussion point you contributed in the meeting. If I approve that then I will sign it. If at the end of the semester you will have 11-15 of those then you will have the full participation grade. If you will have 10-6 then you will have two-thirds of the grade and 5-1 then you will have a third of the grade. Should you decide not to participate that part of the grade is lost.

Basic guidelines:

1. Appeals for grades will be submitted in hardcopy to my mailbox by the end of the week in which you received back your papers.

- 2. Plagiarism as discovered will be passed on to the university's disciplinary authorities please avoid these issues.
- 3. Course website- Please check the website frequently I will upload my presentations there and will use it as a monitoring tool for the group project.
- 4. Students with disabilities- academic training can be rough and is rougher (yet not impossible) for students with disabilities.
